Why A Gleamous Hot Water System Can Give You The Lowest Electric Hot Water Bill In The Street...

If you're like the average Australian... you desperately want to slash your electricity bill...

And while I commend you for taking steps to save the environment (and your wallet!), there's something you should know...

No matter how many lights you turn off... how little you use your air conditioner... or how diligent you are when shopping for energy-efficient devices... chances are there's an 'electricity vampire' hidden in plain sight in your household.

In fact... for most households, this power-hungry bully is responsible for a quarter of your electric bill.

I'm talking, of course, about your electric hot water system.

See, most Australian electric hot water systems keep water at a scalding seventy degrees Celsius... but due to design of the system, by the time it comes out the tap it's already lost at least twenty degrees in temperature.

Yes, that's right... you're already losing a whopping 28% of heat you've paid good money for before it even hits your skin!

Sadly however, it gets worse...

Because while the average electric hot water system holds 315 litres of water... the typical Aussie household only uses about a hundred litres of water a day.

In a nutshell...
